ACHIEVING THE IDEAL IMPRESSION: CLINICAL AND MATERIAL FACTORS

Featuring Dr. Alan Boghosian • Friday, October 14, 2011

Clinicians report that the impression-taking process is the most stressful restorative procedure. This presentation will review the key factors involved in capturing perfect impressions predictably and consistently:

- Chemical and physical properties of elastomeric impression and how they relate to other clinical usage
- Tissue management – the most critical aspect of obtaining a perfect impression
- Selection of appropriate tray material and how it relates to the ideally suited impression tray
- Achieving enhanced flow and preserving working time by modifying the surface prior to impression taking
- New diagnostic and therapeutic devices

Course Objectives

- Understand the importance of materials and technique in achieving ideal impressions
- Learn about techniques available for soft tissue retraction and hemostasis
- Understand the factors involved in selecting tray and impression material
- Learn about techniques and materials available that will enhance impression material flow
